The access point—intro

My name is Noah Seimpetu, I am a 34 years and I have now replenished the strength to write down the events that I endured while ill. Last summer, a series of events tightened my financial circumstances and my diet was greatly afflicted. Quantity took precedence over quality. Six months of this poor diet caused me a number of conditions from debilitating abdominal cramps to severe constipation. On the twelfth day of no bowel movement, I succumbed to shock and began hallucinating profoundly disturbing dreams. As I began losing consciousness, I drank whiskey I had laying next to me. I vomited all over myself and fell into a deep sleep. I woke up the following morning hyperventilating and dripping sweat. I am writing this from my sailboat with my animals on board.

The dream

I heard demons and angels and spirits chanting “run away from the acid rain!” The spirit world was afraid of how bad the physical world was falling apart. The flesh of Humans and animals were contaminated with maggots and parasites alike— no meat. The soil was barren— no plants. Impurities in the drinking water and rain were alike—with acid pouring from the sky. “run away from the acid rain, run!” and the spirit world caused so much chaos that it drove those listening to the ocean; where some drowned, some floated, and some sailed.

Recovery

Claims whiskey and wine helped detox sepsis. Becomes obsessed with sail boats and acquires one. Learns how to sail. Befriends a stray cat that follows him from land to the boat.

The ark

He learns that the cat can enter a deep meditative state in the water and remain with eyes open (marbled eyes). He can’t wake it up. He gets another animal and the same thing happens. Hes disturbed and can’t tell if they’re deal or alive. He learns to master his own madness. He sails with the animals on board and only survives because he can’t tell if he himself is dead or alive. He is too focused navigating the chaotic waters. And he watched the land get destroyed from the water, like everyone else that stayed in the ocean.
